Holiday Issue: The Tracks We Leave Behind!

The Swan Rangers’ first ski outing this winter crossed tracks of both bear and wolverine! Fun outings like these forge friendships and a shared commitment to protect the fish and wildlife that cannot speak for themselves!

We are blessed to still have such critters in the Swan Range. These experiences make us proud of the work we do and make us redouble our efforts to protect habitat and foster a culture of respectful, low-impact recreation.

This year marked our 30th Anniversary of protecting the Swan Range and other parts of the Northern Rockies bioregion. It also marked the 50th Anniversary of The Wilderness Act and allowed us to reconnect with the legendary Stewart Brandborg as we celebrated with a broad array of Wilderness activists.

But it is with great sadness that we bid goodbye to Martin Litton, who fought successfully to secure Redwood National Park and keep dams out of the Grand Canyon (see page 2). Uncompromising folks like Litton leave big tracks in their conservation legacy and even bigger shoes for us to fill! In that spirit we renew our pledge to our members, fish and wildlife on page 3.

On page 4, we give thanks to those of you who have already made donations to support our work this year and we include a few words of unsolicited praise that have come our way recently! Indeed, it is our experiences in wild country and your support through kind words and donations that keep us going!

A special thanks goes out to those of you who helped us meet our Cinnabar challenge grant and, on page 5, we make our end-of-year plea to help us raise the remaining $20,000 needed to meet our expenses this year. It’s been an extra busy year with Flathead Forest Plan revision piled on top of our field work, research and lawsuits filed on behalf of fish and wildlife! We’ve done it before and will again - with your help!

HAPPY SOLSTICE,
HAPPY HOLIDAYS,
HAPPY NEW YEAR!
Martin Litton: May His Legacy and Spirit Live On!

After 70 years on the front lines of the American environmental movement, Martin Litton died on November 30. He was key in getting Redwood National Park designated and worked alongside David Brower to prevent two dams from being built in Grand Canyon. Brower referred to the unflinching Litton as “our conscience.”

David’s son, Kenneth Brower, recently wrote about Litton being called passionate, original, tempestuous, stubborn, charming, obnoxious, courteous, inappropriate, dogged, fiery, and impossibly effective: “They describe, it strikes me, exactly those qualities that have gone missing from environmentalism itself. Environmental organizations are much bigger and richer than they ever were in Litton’s heyday. They are also less stubborn and passionate . . . with more corporate influence on boards . . . much more deal-making with the other side, much less fire in the belly.”

Martin Litton in His Own Words:

“To compromise is to lose . . . you don’t have to be courageous to stand alone, you just have to be ornery.”

“People always tell me not to be extreme. ‘Be reasonable’ they say. But I never felt it did any good to be reasonable about anything in conservation because what you give away will never come back - ever.”

“I don’t give a hoot what people think.”

“What I’m worried about is life. And those things we’re doing to extinguish life.”

David Brower on Martin Litton:

“When I would waver in various conservation battles, he would put a little starch in my backbone by reminding me that we should not be trying to dicker and maneuver . . . and I’m grateful for it.”
The Failings of Compromise and Our Pledge to You

Compromise is a human construct at the root of our political systems. It is bringing our planet to the brink. If we step aside for a moment from our selfish wants and deal-making, we can see what is truly in our best interest is to recognize there are some basic rules of nature that can’t be compromised. Lame efforts to protect sage grouse can serve as an example of the insanity of compromise. Researchers have found that a distance of three miles is needed to keep oil and gas developments from disrupting the breeding grounds of the sage grouse. Montana Governor Steve Bullock’s advisory panel recommended a distance of one mile. Industry objected to that, so Bullock compromised the science again and instead recommends 0.6 miles - as though that is adequate to protect sage grouse.

Even if we could all agree on how much carbon dioxide we humans can safely put into the atmosphere, our compromise-based political systems would allow more than that in order to supposedly protect the world economy while the planet continues to warm. As though that compromise would somehow be wise and sustainable.

While we work and govern in a political world, we live and breathe on a benevolent, living planet. It is high time to bring our politics in line with nature rather than think we can keep on compromising nature. Just how many times are we supposed to cut this baby in half?

We here in the U.S. are down to our last 5% of native forests and similar percentages of roadless public lands that serve as the last, best refugia for fish, wildlife and the healing powers of nature upon the soul. This is hardly the time to be fooled into compromising what little remains in order to be “liked” by our political opponents.

So, our pledge to you is that we will continue to give voice to fish and wildlife through a combination of science, law and advocacy. We will help foster human behavior that minimizes our impacts to fish and wildlife and other people. We will recognize there are some things that remain sacred and off-limits to compromise, such as the natural world, natural laws and our relationship to them. We will continue to fight for every last inch of wild country and seek out opportunities to restore that which has been harmed!
Please Join These Folks In Support our Hard Work!

The folks listed below have already donated to support our work this year - and some will again in December. We need to raise the final $20,000 needed to meet our budget for the year.

We did it last December and can again this year with your help! Won’t you join with these other fine folks in supporting our work this year?
